

Winston Churchill

Now that I am reading a book about this man, I am learned that at the beginning of the last century, he didn't agree with the women vote on elections. He didn't trust them, and on the other hand, women were very aggressive in promoting a law to let them vote.

But finally, he started to change his mind after seeing the helpful work that his daughters made for their country, during World War II.

Another idea that surprise me more is his point of view about muslims. Based of letters written to his brother and other people, we know that Winston identified two kind of muslims. In the first place: the fundamental ones. He thought that they were lost in life because they will never change their mind accepting different religions and the way of life of other people. They will always try to change others by force and violence (such as they are now a days).

Being said by him, there is another kind of muslims that are very good people, brave man, hard working and religious. He fought side by side with them when he was young in Egypt.

In fact, he was very concern that people in India wanted to expulse muslims of their land, and Winston participated in negotiations to define Pakistan as a new nation separated of India to let those people be free and succeed.
